Williamson reports clients having an increased interest in automation to reduce changeover time and decrease losses during transitions. Meanwhile, some processors upgrade their automation in an incremental process that keeps costs in check and improves control.

"For many of our clients running on a Rockwell automation platform, we are seeing a migration from the machine edition (ME) to the site edition (SE)," says Dennis Group's Stotler. The ME environment requires that changes must be implemented on each individual HMI; the SE version provides control on a centralized workstation. This provides better transparency and meets the needs of engineering, maintenance and operations.

Integrating building automation and process control is becoming the norm. Clavco's DeMartini sees a tremendous interest in building automation and process control systems. Designs are taking automation into full consideration as the cost to automate building systems is coming down considerably, and ease of use is improving.

What used to be cutting edge in building management systems has become routine in most projects, says Perkey. IIoT is bringing more usable data from plant floor systems and making it available for maintenance as well. Plus, video systems are used for both security and production monitoring. Control networks in processing and packaging systems have become more reliable and easier to install; the automation in both areas adds flexibility to product offerings and packaging.

A handful of processors have reported large increases in mechanizing warehouse operation, including total automation from incoming to the loading of outbound trucks.

"In warehouses, we've seen an increase in density," says Tom Rychlewski, CRB project manager. "Warehouse operations can be highly automated. While visiting a client in Europe, we toured a pet food plant that was fully automated, from the very beginning of the process to loading the truck. There were very few hands that touched the product. The product was racked, stored, unracked and loaded on the truck, all using automation."

While automation can represent a large capital cost. obviously it can reduce labor costs. And Steve Tippmann, executive vice president of Tippmann Group, sees "creativity in automation as a way to supplement labor shortages in peak demand."

But for some processors, automation might just be a lifeline, according to Haskell's Perkey, "I recently heard one manufacturer say they were not automating to drive labor savings, but for survival. As they had attrition in their labor force, they cannot replace the people and need to automate to keep production moving."
